In Muslim contexts of modernity, women’s corporal visibility and citizenship rights constitute the political stakes around which the public sphere is defined. “Women’s visibility, women’s mobility, and women’s voices”¹ are central in shaping the boundaries of the public sphere. To study the intricate nature of connections between gender, politics, and the public sphere, two historical moments of change in Turkish history and contemporary experience are crucial: the projects of modernization in the 1920s, and movements of Islamization in the 1980s. Historical classification of projects of modernism on the one hand and Islamism on the other, and the centrality of the question of gender in shaping political debates, social transformations, and definitions of public and private spheres, can be extended to other Muslim contexts of modernities. Historically, however, since it defined women as public citizens, the Turkish mode of modernization can be considered the most radical engagement among Muslim countries.

Equating national progress with women’s emancipation formed the backbone of Kemalist feminism. Simultaneously, during the last two decades, Turkey, like other Muslim countries, has witnessed the advent of contemporary Islamism.²

¹. Farzaneh Milani, Veils and Words: The Emerging Voices of Iranian Women Writers (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1992), 238.
². I refer to Islamism as a contemporary social movement that takes varying political forms in varying national contexts; it can take the form of revolution in Iran, of a legal political party in Turkey, or of clandestine oppositional movements, as in Tunisia, Egypt, and Algeria. The common features among them are the urban nature of the phenomenon, the participation of the young urban-

Public Culture 10(1): 61–81
Copyright © 1997 by Duke University Press
Turkey’s most visible and challenging symbol of this development has been “the veiling issue,” sometimes referred to as the “headscarf dispute”—the demand by Muslim girls that they be allowed to cover their heads according to Islamic precepts while attending public schools. An Islamist party (Refah Partisi) has been the senior member of a coalition government since July 1996, rendering the Islamization of the public debate and its relation to gender issues more tangible in Turkish politics. Further, the privatization of television and radio has brought Turkey lively public debate. Especially since 1983, with the transition to democracy after the 1980 military coup, roundtables, panels, and talk shows have been a popular medium for intellectuals, political actors, and citizens debating on the issues of identity, secularism, ethnicity, and democracy. In other words, the public sphere is freeing itself from state control.

Women’s issues are pivotal in the shaping of modern political debate and the public sphere in Muslim countries. Two broader preoccupations underlie this emphasis on the connections between gender and the public sphere. The first is related to the phenomenon of contemporary Islamism and the related questions of democracy. Political scientists have explained Islamist movements as a political strategy for the implementation of a state governed by Islamic law—fundamentalist movements trying to implement the Sharia again. The question of educated youth (both male and female) and, at the ideological level, the criticism of traditional interpretations of Islam and the quest for an Islamic alternative to modernity. It is a social movement (following Alain Touraine’s definition) in the sense that it redefines an Islamic identity and enters into a conflict about the orientation of the cultural model. On social movements, see Alain Touraine, The Voice and the Eye: An Analysis of Social Movement (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981). For an approach to Islamism as a social movement, see Nilüfer Göle, “L’émergence du sujet Islamique,” Penser le Sujet (Autour d’Alain Touraine), ed. François Dubet and Michel Wieviorka (Paris: édition Fayard, 1995).

3. Veiling, covering, and headscarf are used interchangeably to designate the Islamic principle of hijab, i.e., the necessity for women to cover their hair, their shoulders, and the shapes of their bodies to preserve their virtue and avoid being a source of fitne, i.e., disorder. The contemporary Islamic dress is generally a headscarf that completely covers the hair and falls upon the shoulders (quite distinct from the traditional use of a headscarf) and a long gown that hides the feminine shape. Since the 1980s, the demand by female students to be allowed to attend public schools with a headscarf has become the most debated and divisive issue in Turkey’s public debate between secularists and Islamists. For a detailed discussion on this dispute see Olson Emelie, “Muslim Identity and Secularism in Contemporary Turkey: The Headscarf Dispute,” Anthropological Quarterly 4, no. 58 (1985): 161–171. The same debate also exists in Western contexts. For instance, France is experiencing a juridical, political, and quasi-philosophical dispute about the rights of Muslim girl students to cover their heads in French high schools. The media often refer to the issue as “l’affaire du foulard.” Cf. Françoise Gaspard and Farhad Khosrokhavar, Le Foulard et la République (Paris: éd. la Découverte, 1995).
women has remained for them secondary or at best instrumental in relation to the strategies of Islamists to seize political power. In such approaches women’s politics appeared only as an epiphenomenon of Islamism, or at best a subordinate issue of human rights. At the other extreme, feminist and anthropological approaches focus on questions of identity and community, leaving aside the deci-siveness of women’s issues for power and politics and choices of social projects.⁴
Only in recentering the question of women can we gain a better grasp of the nature of the discord between Islamists and secularists. The predominance of economic and political explanations obscures the importance of social and cultural categories underpinning contemporary Islam. Construing Islamic radicalism as a consequence of social frustration and economic deprivation ignores indigenous power relations between social classes and the self-definitional quality of Islamic identity.

Questions of identity must negotiate problematic relations both to gender and to Western modernity, revealing the social relations of power between modernist-Westernist elites and those who challenge them from the Islamist perspective.
Gender issues, such as communitarian morality, women’s modesty, and the social mixing between men and women, are central to Islamist politics’ desire to differentiate itself from modernist liberal projects and Islamists’ endeavors to control the public sphere. I argue that, in Islamist politics, the stakes of democracy are inseparable from the (shrinking) boundaries of the public sphere, which in turn are determined foremost by categories of morality and identity and, thus, gender issues. In short, Islamist politics is the (puritan) politics of controlling public visibilities and intimacies.

Whereas in Western European history the public sphere emerged as a liberal-bourgeois sphere, with women (and the working class) initially excluded and thus also excluded from the definition of the universal citizen,⁵ in the Turkish mode of modernization women’s visibility and citizenship rights endorsed the existence of the public sphere. But by the same token, the public sphere, as a site of the modernist project, was tightly monitored by the secular elites. Consesequently, in Muslim contexts of modernity, the public sphere emerges as an outcome not of a liberal bourgeois ideology but of authoritarian state modernism.
Hence, both the gendered and the authoritarian nature of the public sphere in

⁴. Diana Singerman shares this interest in linking women and politics. Cf. Diane Singerman, ⁵. Mary P. Ryan, “Gender and Public Access: Women’s Politics in Nineteenth Century America,” in _Habermas and the Public Sphere_, ed. Craig Calhoun (Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1993), 277.
modernist projects shaped by secularist elites define the particularity of Turkish appropriations of modernity.

The Public Sphere as a Secular Way of Life

The Turkish case of secularism is distinguished by its radicality among the Muslim countries. The Turkish Republic was proclaimed in 1923; the Khalifate was abolished in 1924; family law was completely secularized (a unique experience among Muslim countries) by the adoption of the Swiss Civil Code in 1926 (hence religious marriages and polygamy were forbidden), and, finally, the Turkish Republic was declared a “secular state” by a constitutional amendment in 1937.

Although Turkish secularism is inspired by the French laicité—basically, the gradual separation of state affairs from religion, the neutrality of the state toward various denominational groups, and the irreligiosity of the public sphere—it follows a different pattern. First, Turkish secularism does not encourage the separation and autonomy of religion from state power. On the contrary, institutional religion is placed totally under state control in order to bring the religious idiom and education in line with modernist and rationalist ideals. Second, it is hard to speak of the state’s equidistance from all denominational groups because Sunni Islam implicitly represents state religion, which is challenged today by the Alevites. Only in regard to the third feature, the irreligiosity of the public sphere, can we speak of similarities. The similarity between the two cases, French and Turkish, is the secularist and universalistic conception of the public sphere; that is, one enters into public spaces, mainly into the realms of education and politics, leaving behind one’s particularistic identities and religious affiliations. In accordance with the ideals of the Enlightenment, it is the universalistic conception of citizenship, regardless of gender, religion, and ethnicity, that underlies the secularism of the public sphere. The secularization of the public space, the disappearance of religious symbols and practices (such as the removal

---

7. Such a secularist and universalist concept of the public sphere is best elaborated in Habermas’s work. Jürgen Habermas, The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere (Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1991). Today, efforts to include communitarian aspects, gender identities, class dimensions, and ethnicity expand the definition of the public sphere as a liberal bourgeois sphere and contribute to our understanding of the contemporary problems of democracy. See Craig Calhoun, ed., Habermas and the Public Sphere (Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1992), and Seyla Benhabib, Situating the Self (New York: Routledge, 1992).
of the crucifix from schools and courts), is a significant aspect of French secularism. The process happened gradually and through political democratization during France’s Third Republic. In contrast, in Turkey, as in other Muslim countries, secularism as a prerequisite of Westernism has been implemented by authoritarian political systems.

Turkey’s secularist project, shaped during the single-party period of the Republic, ordered the expunging of all religious signs and practices from the public sphere in order to install the modern way of life: the banning of religious shrines (türkbe) and the dervish orders (tarikat) (1925); the prohibition of traditional Ottoman headgear, the red felt cap, the fez, and its replacement with the European hat (1925); the adoption of the Western calendar (1926); the replacement of Arabic script with Latin script (1928); the imposition of certain types of music at state radio stations and television channels—all are a testimony to the desire to cut links with the Islamic world in a turn toward Western civilization.

Ernest Gellner calls Kemalist secularism a didactic secularism: it is moralistic and pedagogical; it imposes and teaches secularism as a Western way of living. The secularization of education, politics, and also of everyday life practices and social spaces is critical to the modernist project. The adoption of the metric system and the Gregorian calendar, the celebration of the New Year, the acceptance of Sunday as the official day of rest, and the civil marriage ceremony exemplify the imposition of Western secularism at the level of temporal organization, daily life, and social practices. As such, the public sphere describes a space for the making of new republican elites, while excluding those who do not conform to this new life, that is, the non-Westernized Muslim population. The public sphere does not initially appear as democracy providing equal access of all citizens to rational-critical debate on public issues but emerges as a model of modernist patterns of conduct and living.

Further, in a Muslim context, the existence of a public sphere is attested by women’s visibility and the social intermixture of men and women. It is the construction of women as public citizens and women’s rights (even more cherished than the construction of citizenship and civil rights) that are the backbone of Turkish modernism. The removal of the veil, the establishment of compulsory co-education for girls and boys, the guarantee of civil rights for women including eligibility to vote and to hold office, and the abolition of Islamic family law guarantee the public visibility and citizenship of women. In other words, women’s bodily, social, and political visibility defines the modernist public sphere in the Kemalist project.

Hence, Turkish Kemalist modernism cannot be grasped without understanding the centrality of women, as both agents and symbols of secular modernism. Each revolution redefines the attributes of an “ideal man,” yet Kemalist revolution represents and idealizes new women figures in their social roles, public visibility, and Western appearances and ways of life.

The celebration and production of women’s visibility both in women’s corporeality and in their public roles as models for emulation furthered the secularization of public life. Photographs of women unveiled, women in athletic competitions, women pilots, women professionals, and men and women living European lifestyles were the new modernist representations of a “prestigious” life.¹⁰ Novels of the republic would base their casts on this new “civilized” way of life, take its decor, goods, and clothing as their backdrop, and celebrate the ideal attributes and rituals of a “progressive and civilized” republican individual. Tea salons, dinners, balls, and streets would be the public spaces for the socializing of sexes; husband and wife walking hand in hand, men and women shaking hands, dancing at balls, and dining together would characterize the European style of male-female encounter. Among the cast of characters would appear serious, working women devoted to national progress—these to be distinguished from “superficial,” mannered claims to Europeanness.¹¹ Against Ottoman cosmopolitanism, Kemalist woman characters, affirming seriousness, modesty, and devotion, would accommodate the presumed pre-Islamic Anatolian culture and thereby incarnate the nationalist project.

Yakup Kadri Karaosmanoglu’s novel Ankara (1934) is among the best examples of trying to overcome the tensions between Western cosmopolitanism and nationalist modernism by accommodating woman’s public participation with the values of modesty. The leading female character in the novel, originally from Istanbul, is depicted positively as a “Westernized” woman who is alienated from her native people and can find fulfillment only in becoming closer to people. Consequently, she moves from Istanbul to Ankara, the new capital (1924) of the republic, searching for “authentic” Anatolian roots for the nationalist project, in distinction to Istanbul, the site of Ottoman cosmopolitanism. Selma is portrayed with sympathy as having high esteem among the vigorous neighborhood women, as a “boyish person” without salient hips and breasts (physical traits considered European), and leading a “modern” way of life, that is, eating at the same table with men and riding horses in their company. Nonetheless, the Western way of life, especially the one promulgated by the cosmopolitan Istanbul elites and symbolized by the gramophone, Swiss governesses, white gloves, dancing, and bridge parties, is criticized by the novelist as a source of the leading female character’s alienation not only from her own people but also from herself.

¹¹. For criticism of superficial Westernization and of male characters in Turkish novels, see Serif Mardin, “Super Westernization in the Ottoman Empire in the Last Quarter of the Nineteenth Century,” in Turkey: Geographic and Social Perspectives, ed. P. Benedict et al. (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1974).

Yakup Kadri calls on his characters to turn back to the “plain, intimate and strongly personal, sincere life” experienced during the period of the struggle for national independence. “Turkish women have forsaken their charshafs and veils to be able to work with more ease and comfort. . . . Yes, a Turkish woman has claimed her freedom and used it not to dance, and to polish her nails . . . to be a puppet, but to undertake a demanding and serious role in the constitution and development of a new Turkey.”

Hence, women were paramount to the project of nationalist modernism and Westernized secularism. Republican men called on women to be active agents in the building of a modern nation. Thus the emancipation of women from traditional and religious roles was desired to the extent that women acquired public roles and public visibility for the national cause, which in turn implied collective consciousness and modesty rather than individualism.

Women’s participation in public life as citizens and as civil servants, their visibility in urban spaces, and their socialization with men all defined the modern secular way of life and indicated a radical shift from the social organization and gender roles framed by Islamic religion. In other words, in a Muslim context, secularism denotes a modern way of life, calling for the “emancipation” of women from religion signified by veiling and the segregation of the sexes. Women, as they move from interior to exterior space, acquire public roles to participate in the making of the modern individual.

Images of Kemalist women convey the modernist aspirations of the public as well as the domestic sphere. Women as public servants (serving the interests of the republican state), as teachers (educating), participating in beauty contests and sports festivals (emancipated in their bodies), performing on the stage (not fettered with religious prohibitions), going to restaurants, driving cars (occupying urban spaces)—all these new roles increasing public visibility were endorsed by the feminine elites and encouraged by the “paternalizing males” of the young republic, who shared a nationalist pride in creating a new part of the “civilized” Western world.14 Domestic life and ideals were also under the influence of Western values, with a new emphasis on the conjugal couple and a new interest in health and hygiene.15 New periodicals, advertisements, novels brought domestic life under the public gaze, or, in other words, modern domestic life was publicized. Women as modern housemakers, consumers of new hygienic products, and parents embodied the pedagogical civilizing mission in matters of modern living. The house and the domestic interior followed the Westernized aspirations for the nuclear family and found their expression in “comfortable, simple and plain cubic” architecture (Le Corbusier’s ideas were a source of inspiration for a whole generation of Turkish architects throughout the 1930s).16 The modernist project aimed to constitute a new way of being and living, transmitted primarily by women and their changing intimacies with men in a newly constituted public sphere.

Hence, in the Turkish modernization project, the public sphere was closely monitored by the state, rigidly in the early republican years, especially during the single-party period, from 1923 to 1946, softening gradually from the 1950s on with the transition to pluralistic democracy (a process interrupted by the military interventions of 1960, 1971, and 1980). During the post-1983 period, the public sphere gained more autonomy from the state and became the arena of competing civil society movements (such as Islamist, Kurdish, Alevite, liberal) that challenged the national, secularist, and homogeneous character of the republican project of the public sphere. The demand by female Muslim students to be allowed to attend university classes in Islamic dress is the most visible assault on this project and is perceived by the secular elites as an invasion of “their” public sphere (university classes, parliament, television, concert halls, streets).

Veiling between Public Visibility and Communitarian Morality

Ironically, in a similar way but from the opposite direction, women play a central role in contemporary Islamist movements of the post-1980 period; the veiling of women is the most visible emblem and indicator of the Islamization of politics, male and female relations, urban spaces, and daily practices. Between modernism and Islamism, the stakes remain the same: the battleground remains self-definitions, gendered spatial divisions and practices, and civilizational affiliations. Women’s agency and public visibility characterize contemporary Islamism and constitute a challenge to traditional precepts of Islam calling for the seclusion and segregation of women. New female actors of Islamism make their way to public university education, to political life, to the urban heterosocial spaces of modernity. Hence, there is a kind of continuation and at the same time a reversal of modernist women’s mode of participation in public life in the mode of public participation of Islamist women. In both cases, new public roles for women are gained by access to education and justified by political society-building projects; both modernism and Islamism value women as educators and missionaries. Furthermore, women, in their differing semiologies of body, symbolize and publicly endorse the plurality of civilizational choices. Thus, women are not secondary, auxiliary actors but, on the contrary, significant signifiers for both the movement of modernism and Islamism. But on the other hand, women’s identities, whether seen in individual aspirations or collective feminist consciousness, are confined within the broader boundaries of political projects. Both images of women, the modernist and the Islamist, subordinate female identities—whether relating to individual or collective consciousness—to values of modesty demanded by the populist nature of both ideologies. Yet there is a shift in the image of the ideal woman from “modern yet modest” to “Islamic thus modest.”17 Islamist veiling expresses the unapologetic assertion of modesty and religiosity in new self-definitions of Muslim women.

It is this unapologetic stand toward modernity that distinguishes the identity politics of contemporary Islamism.18 Definitions of self, disputes about lifestyles and artistic expression—in short, body politics and, more specifically, gender politics—become a central stake in the public debate in which secularists oppose Islamists.

The coming to power of the Islamist Refah Party at the municipal level (on March 27, 1994) and its senior partnership in a coalition government (since July 1996) has brought to the surface of the Turkish political agenda these issues problematizing the existing boundaries between the public and the private. Islamist politics aims for the moral control of the public sphere through the traditional practices of compelling women’s modesty by veiling, limiting public encounters between the sexes, prohibiting alcohol consumption, and censoring the arts. Almost mirroring the stance of modernism, Islamic faith posits itself as the reference point for the reideologization of seemingly trivial social issues of ways of living, speaking, and relating to each other. All its expressions criticize secular living and exhibit a desire to moralize the public sphere according to the requirements of an Islamic way of life. Consequently, in a Muslim context, the lifestyle dispute, far from being a trivial issue of individual choices or changing trends, defines the shrinkage or expansion of the boundaries of the public sphere and, in turn, the stakes of democracy.

Contemporary actors of Islamism have access to modern education, to urban life, and to politics and public visibility but refuse assimilation to the values of secularism and modernist elites. The reasons for Islamist radicalism are thus related to this quest for authenticity, to the class relations of domination and exclusion, and more precisely to the conflictual relations with modernist Westernist elites. The alteration in lifestyles, in aesthetic and ethical values that generated a civilizational shift from the Islamic to the Western, is not independent of class relations of power. Western taste as a social indicator of distinction established new social divisions, creating new social status groups (in the Weberian sense referring to lifestyles) and thus changed the terms of social stratification. Thus there emerges a domain of power struggle, a habitus in Bourdieu’s terms, a realm beyond our language and will, encompassing habits of eating, body language, and taste. Contemporary Islamic radicalism problematizes the Westernized habitus as a legitimating milieu for elites. It reveals this power struggle in an aggravated form, criticizing the equation of the “civilized” with the “Westernized” and advancing as an alternative the Islamization of life and lifestyle.

The politicization of Islam empowers and promotes the return of Muslim actors, ethics, and aesthetics to the historical scene. In this respect, Islamist movements share with other contemporary Western social movements the same critical sensitivity regarding Enlightenment modernity. They are thus similar to feminist, civil rights, environmental, and ethnic movements in that all display the force of the repressed (gender, nature, ethnicity, and religion, respectively) and criticize universalistic, monistic conceptions of modernity. Like feminism, which questions the universalistic and egalitarian claims of the category of human being and asserts instead the difference of women, Islamism problematizes the universalistic claims of “Western civilization,” which exclude Islamic difference. Just as radical feminism refuse strategies to assimilate women in the category of human being—which is to say male being—and forges instead women’s identity in terms of its difference, Islamism refuses strategies of assimilation in a modern civilization equated with Western culture and forges instead its own difference. In both cases, it is the refusal of assimilation and the unapologetic attitude toward egalitarian, monistic, and global forces of modernity that underpins the exacerbation of differences and identities. The motto “Black is beautiful” is resonant in all new protest movements, since they all reject assimilation to “man,” “white,” and “Western”; on the contrary, all define their identity, their source of empowerment and identity politics in terms of difference, as women, blacks, and Muslims. Similarly, the motto “Islam is beautiful” gains credence in Islamic contexts. The Islamic way of dressing, way of living, and faith—all considered forces of obscurantism, backwardness, uncivilization, and the dark side of modernity and thus taken as abetting Muslim oppression and exclusion—are reappropriated and accentuated by Islamist actors. Hence, through the political radicalization of Islam, Muslim identity makes itself apparent and seeks to acquire legitimacy in the modern political idiom. Islamism is the exacerbation of Muslim identity and its reconstruction in and by the modern world. In other words, Islamism renders Muslim actors visible in the public sphere by accentuating their differences. The covering of women conveys the equivocal meanings and tensions between limitations of the self (modesty) and collective empowerment (difference), between public visibility and private intimacies.

The similarities to and contrasts with the Western feminist movement provide us with further clues to understanding the paradoxes engendered by contemporary Islamism in relation to democracy and the public sphere. Both feminism and Islamism introduce the intimate, private realm, be it religion or sexuality, into politics. The feminist motto “The personal is political” contributed to the enlargement of politics toward issues of self-definition and male-female relations of domination. In a way, the feminist movement followed the drive of modern societies, which according to Michel Foucault is to search for “truth” and (stemming from earlier Christian religious practices) to “confess” the most intimate experiences, desires, illnesses, uneasiness, guilt in public. This explains how everything thought to be the most difficult to say, everything forbidden, rooted in the personal, private sphere, becomes, once confessed, public, political, and knowable. Feminism (as shown by the novelty of its labels: abortion rights, sexual harassment, and date rape) contributes to this movement of exposure to and transparency in the public sphere but equally to the broadening of democracy, which transforms intimate relations of domination into political relations of power.

With the advent of Islamist movements, faith, self-definitions, and male-female relations—all aspects of the domain of intimate, private relations—are also brought to public light, into politics. Simultaneously, this realm reappears as a site of religious identity’s resistance to the assimilative power of Western secularism and modernity. Islamism makes an issue of the interior-intimate gendered space but also calls for political interventions to enforce woman’s modesty and its own models of male-female relations. Islamism tends to reinforce communitarian morality by redefining the public order in conformity with Islamic prohibitions. We can suggest that Islamism has a counterpart in non-Western contexts where a communitarian morality animates social groups resisting the globalization of modernist values by tourism, satellite TV, and consumerism. Communitarian morality can be said to be a trait of societies in which modern individualism, individual conscience, confession, and public exposure of the self have not dominated the structuring of individual and social relations. In the West the modern individual emerges with the basic presupposition that absolute truth is a matter of individual conscience (implying “private thoughts,” “self-accusation,” “self-awareness”) and not of collectivity. The Muslim context directs one to give oneself up to God and let the community (cemaat) guide one through life. Thus, communitarian guidance in moral affairs is legitimated by religion and by daily life practices, which can in turn get articulated as authoritarianism from below. In this respect, the Salman Rushdie case—in which Muslim outrage exceeded the edict “from above” of the death-fatwa of the Ayatollah Khomeini, swelling up “from below” as well—exemplifies the connections between communitarian morality and the conflict with the West over identity, as revived by contemporary radical Islamism. In a similar way, the interdependence between the Muslim community’s fabric and religiosity and women’s morality is further revealed by an Egyptian case of blasphemy, less disseminated than the Rushdie affair, yet more significant.24 Dr. Nasr Abou Zeid, a professor of the University of Cairo working on the interpretations of the Koran, was accused of opposing the religious law, the Sharia, and declared an apostate. In May 1993, Islamist lawyers arguing that a Muslim woman does not have the right to remain married with a non-Muslim, sued for Professor Zeid’s divorce based on a religious law, hisba (last applied in the 1950s, it gives every Muslim the right to bring charges against someone if he or she considers the overriding interests of the community to be threatened). This case reveals that the Islamization of public debate and the public sphere is not independent of women’s roles, modesty, chastity, and religiosity, all considered pillars of the integrity of the (lost) Muslim community. In a sense, contemporary Islamism can be read as an endeavor to recuperate the lost community. The restoration of certain signs, especially the (re)veiling of women, symbolizes this imagined political community in the sense that it reinforces social ties among individuals who do not know each other but dream of broad and profound attachment.25 Even more than as a political ideology, Islamism appears as an imagined community forged and reinforced by and within the realm of the sacred.26

The current veiling movement carries images of educated, urban, and militant Muslim women to the public sphere and renders them visible in their political agency, while recalling women’s modesty and role as guardians of the communitarian morality—reinforcing the idea of a sphere of the forbidden. Women acquire legitimacy and visibility through their participation in higher education and Islamic politics. Yet there is a covert tension, a paradox, in this mode of empowerment through Islamism: they quit traditional life roles, making their personal life a matter of choice, pursuing a professional and/or political career, yet they acquiesce in incarnating the Islamic way of life, Islamic morality, and Islamic community. Thus, Islamism unintentionally engenders the individuation of women while simultaneously restraining it. Islamism allows women access to public life, but this is an access limited to the purported good of the community, to the missionary goal. The

---

26. Emile Durkheim long ago pointed out the two distinct realms, sacred and profane, each indispensable for the establishment and reproduction of the social tie.
politicization of the Islamic way of life can hinder individual lifestyle choices. Again, the monitoring of the public sphere depends on the monitoring of women.

Yet human agency always has unintended consequences; the dynamics of action elude the intentions and wills of the actors themselves. Islamism is no exception to this rule. Its visibility in the public sphere is concomitant with new Muslim subjectivities. By entering the public sphere it engenders new Muslim subjectivities, which in turn challenge the Islamist ideal of a homogeneous public order legitimated by the conscience communautaire.

The Homogeneity of the Public Sphere and the Emergence of Muslim Subjectivities

In the last two decades, especially with the advent of contemporary Islamist movements, the homogeneity of the secular public sphere in Turkey has been undergoing a radical challenge. Islamist movements aim politically for the moral control of the public sphere, thereby restricting democracy; on the other hand, they enlarge the public sphere by creating new Islamic public visibilities and new Islamic public spaces. The bastions of modernity, such as the university, the media, and politics, until recently exclusive domains of the secular elites in Turkey, are increasingly witnessing the introduction of Islamist actors. A new figure, that of the Islamist public intellectual, whose modern university education provides access to secular as well as Islamic sources of knowledge and who can be a journalist, politician, or academician, a man or a woman, competes with secular elites for cultural, political, and media power. Not without difficulty, friction, and hostility, secular elites are sharing university classes, academic conferences, public roundtables, talk shows, the ranks of parliament, municipalities, concert halls, and boat trips on the Bosphorus with new Muslim public faces. The latter compete for an audience in electoral politics but also for a share of the commercial market, for media ratings and for followers in literate culture.

Therefore, the emergence of the Islamic public sphere enters into a very complex, competitive, equivocal relationship with modernity; it cannot be reduced to the identity politics of resistance to modernism and consumerism. The relationship between “markets and freedom, commodity and identity, property and pleasure” are far more complex and decisive in the construction of public spheres than the politics of resistance suggests.27 For instance, the black public sphere in the United States uses performativity to capture black audiences to buy this or read that because it is authentically black. In a similar way, Islamism carves a space for itself, its products ranging from instruments of cultural criticism such as Islamic novels, films, music, and newspapers to alternative consumption strategies, such as Islamic dress and fashion shows, and the Islamization of urban ways of living: patronizing restaurants and hotels respecting Islamic rules demanding nonalcoholic beverages and the observance of prayer hours.

---

The recently acquired visibility of “Islam” in the public sphere competes and conflicts with the secularist points of view but also provokes tensions within Islamist politics. The politicization of Islam renders publicly visible new issues and new actors, but radical Islamism calls for modesty and censorship in the public presentation of self. It carries new actors to public visibility, providing them with opportunities ranging from cultural mediation through professional politics and journalism to consumption, yet Islamism tries to constrain and confine this realm within ideological boundaries. Hence, there is an inbred tension between individuation strategies, self-definitions, and subjectivities of Islamist actors and the prerequisites of Islamist politics, which tries to contain them within the limits of collective action and communitarian good. Again, women’s issues are decisive in the unfolding dynamics of these tensions. The forbidden boundaries of the public sphere are drawn by the obstruction of women’s visibility. But as women give voice to their aspirations and occupy new professional, political, and urban spaces, they instigate a subversive process, independent of their intentions and will.

Islamist women appear at the crossroads of these puzzles because the more they gain public visibility and realize educational and professional ambitions, the more they find themselves in conflict with the traditions or interpretations that prescribe maternal and marital duties as their foremost moral obligations; this forces them to develop new definitions of self. In their own words, they say “no to femininity, yes to personality,” thus upholding modesty while opening an autonomous sphere for life strategies independent of their roles as wives, as mothers, and even as militants of a collective movement. Feminism serves as an intellectual resource in the building of a distinct consciousness of women’s identity within the Islamic movement. It has become the source of a demarcation

28. Ibid.
30. The emergence of a secular feminist movement in Turkey during the 1980s contributed to the proliferation of feminist writings. For a study of the radical feminist movement in Turkey, cf. Yesim between distinct interpretations of men and women but also between women themselves: between those who acquiesce to the prescribed traditional gender roles and Islamic militancy without question and those who develop a criticism of these roles from within, forging new self-limitations. A hybrid Islamic and feminist consciousness initially emerged from below and was limited to internal discussions of the Islamist movement. In the 1990s it led to more overt expressions in public debate through publications (magazines on woman’s identity) and nongovernmental woman’s organizations.

Every step toward increasing the public visibility of women via Islamist movements triggers a new issue of public debate—setting secularists and Islamists in opposition, but also pitting Islamists against themselves. For instance, with the end of the state monopoly on broadcasting, commercial broadcasting has rendered Islam ubiquitously visible on Turkish television. Yet the presence of women, the image of uncovered or covered women on Islamic television channels, continues to be the boundary separating different trajectories of the Islamic public sphere and ideological positions within Islamism. Similarly, the proliferation of private Islamic radio stations opens up a new realm of job opportunities for Islamic women journalists. But the issue of “women’s voices,” considered by some a provocation and thus “illicit,” renders women’s professional presence precarious, keeping its legitimacy in question.

Another example of these paradoxes of Islamic public visibility can be found in tourism and the changing consumption patterns of the newly formed Islamic middle classes. The popularity of a new luxury hotel (Caprice Hotel) that offers summer vacations in conformity with “Islamic” rules—prayer hours, nonalcoholic beverages, separate beaches and swimming pools for men and women, Islamic swimwear for both sexes—attests well the degree to which Islamist identity difference is inseparable from consumption, commodity, property, and even

---

31. Some of these new forms of Islamic public visibilities, characterizing especially the 1990s, were studied by my students at Bogazici University within the framework of my seminar on Islamist movements during the academic year 1995–1996. I refer to the works of Kenan Cayir on nongovernmental Islamic women’s associations (Woman’s Rainbow Platform), to Umut Azak on veiled women journalists in Islamic radio stations, Mucahit Bilici on the example of an Islamic vacation hotel, Ugur Komecoglu on the movement of Fetullah. These are works in progress for a collective publication in Turkish.

pleasure patterns dictated by global and local trends of the market economy. Islamist intellectuals advocating resistance and authenticity criticize such integrative and conformist strategies as an attempt to strengthen the Islamist movement by means of the Western lifestyle of consumption and vacation. Yet for many members of the newly formed middle classes, “vacation” is as natural as “working”; neither can be given up merely because it is allegedly Western.

An Autobiographical Novel by a Young Islamist

A novel written by a young Islamist writer is an example of a more self-reflexive mode of changing Muslim subjectivities as an unfolding process of political Islamism. The novel by Mehmet Efe can be considered an autobiographical novel bearing witness to his own and his generation’s Islamism. The writer, in his twenties, tells a story of the Islamist generation during the post-1980 period. His narrative of an Islamist male student of his own age provides us with additional clues, images that can help clarify our definitions of an Islamist and of radical Islamism. Irfan (a name meaning “knowledge,” which is described as the pillar of the civilizations of the East) is a student in the history department of Istanbul University. He defines himself as part of the general Islamist movement; that is, he is “Muslim, religious, Islamist, radical revolutionary, fundamentalist, pro-Iranian, Sufi, etc. . . . somebody belonging among all these.” He is typical of students in the Islamist movements of the post-1980s: coming from a provincial town, originally from the lower middle class, with a traditional religious family background, he becomes an Islamist when he arrives at a university in the large city of Istanbul. His life exhibits upward social mobility, since he is the first of his family to gain access to higher education and urban life. He depicts his student life as a political Islamist and activist. Collective prayers in a mosque, political demonstrations against Israel and the United States, participation in panels, visits to Islamic bookstores and trials are the activities and spaces he frequents. In the corridors of the university and on the streets of Istanbul, he acts as an Islamist revolutionary: “We were actors, heros of the images in our dreams incited by the Iranian revolution.” Acquiring political consciousness empowers him in his relations with girls as well: “Before, when a girl asked me a question, I was so perplexed, not knowing what to do. . . . afterwards, that is after acquiring political

---

34. Ibid., 78.
35. Ibid., 16.
consciousness . . . finding myself among the people who believe in liberation, salvation through Islam, girls didn’t appear to me important enough to be taken seriously . . . and those who were covered [read Islamist] were my sisters [bacim]. They were the pioneers, mothers of the society that I was dreaming of and struggling for.”

This narrative of an Islamist student is almost the exact mirror-image of that of revolutionary leftist students in the 1970s in Turkey. Each has a dream of an ideal society, a utopia for liberation and salvation; and for each this implies a radical, that is a complete, revolutionary change of the society. In both cases, the life of a revolutionary necessitates giving up the pleasures of daily life as a male and as a student, pleasures now considered trivial. As militants and missionaries, they commit to and project themselves into the future ideal society. In other words, for the sake of public ideals and political revolution, private, intimate identities and relations are given up. Ironically, male actors of leftism and Islamism empower themselves politically in repressing their male identities and thus reproduce the dominant values of a communitarian morality that tolerates male-female socialization only within the accepted boundaries of sisters, mothers, or comrades.

The young Islamist character of the novel is unable to radically change his society, but he does experience radical personal change when he falls in love with an Islamist co-ed. The girl, as a new image of Muslim woman, and the love he deeply develops for her present a constant challenge to his political convictions and collective commitments. Being in love with her triggers an epiphany that results in an emergent new Muslim self.

The girl represents those female actors of contemporary Islamism who are self-assertive and yearn for educational success. Boy meets girl on registration day at the university: Islamists are protesting the prohibition of Islamic veiling, and he asks her to participate in the boycott. She retorts with feminist irony and criticism, advancing her individual identity (and her preference for registering). She does not accept that men speak and act on behalf of women: “Did you ask my opinion of the action? You men make speeches, satisfy yourself exhibiting heroic actions, and we should be the decoration, ha?” She mocks the male activists of Islamism: “Protesting became a fixation for you. . . . You feel an inferiority complex in relation to leftists? Is that why you impatiently jumped on our headScarves?”

36. Ibid., 15.
37. Ibid., 17.
38. Ibid., 32.
The female character, Nurcan, is representative of Islamist female actors of the 1980s and 1990s: self-affirming, educated, urban, and critical. Her role in the novel exemplifies well Islamist women as generators of change not passively acquiescent to the logic of the movement. She is a duplicate of the Islamist women characters who changed the movement from within, as described in my book The Forbidden Modern—but with a significant difference. The novel follows but also exceeds the hidden dynamics depicted in The Forbidden Modern, rendering them manifest from the point of view of a male protagonist of Islamism.

Falling in love with one of those new kind of Islamic girls (“It would have been so much simpler with a traditional, docile girl from a village,” he complains) plays a cathartic role in his questioning of revolutionary political Islamism. She is an intellectual pioneer in this criticism. We read in her words, taken from her diary: “Such an absurdity! The majority of us start taking seriously the roles we want to play. . . . They are walking in the corridors as if they were going to realize the revolution tomorrow. . . . Some among us even say things such as ‘Muslim men are too passive.’ Everyone is rapidly on the way to ‘masculinization’ [erkeksilesiyor]. . . . They also put into my hands books. Books with phrases that put on my shoulders the obligation to be a warrior, a guerrilla, to take the responsibility for a war that would change everything and the world fundamentally. . . . I am small. I am weak. I am a girl. I am a girl . . . GIRL.” Hence, as she reappropriates her identity as a young girl, she resists the political and collective roles ascribed to her. Ironically, her “weakness,” her withdrawal to the intimate, private life and the boundaries of identity constitutes a new source of power to criticize the Islamic ambitions of radical change.

At the end of his journey for change, Irfan echoes her words, writing of his desire to distance himself from political militant Islamism: “I want to take off this militant uniform [parka]. . . . I want to exist not with my enmities but with my friendships. . . . I want to satisfy myself with small things. I cannot carry any longer universal things.” Rediscovering the private “small” life provides an anchor to limit the totalizing nature of the Islamist project. Love reintroduces desire, intimacy, and privacy. “Falling in love” with a woman is already problematic for an Islamist because, in the words of Irfan, “a Muslim does not fall in love with a woman, but only with Allah.” For the first time, and to his own surprise, he starts to share with his friends a personal subject, his love for this

39. Ibid., 49.
40. Ibid., 50–51.
41. Ibid., 170–173.
42. Ibid., 19.
woman. At the end of the novel, he starts searching for a job and dreams of their life as a happily married couple, imagining himself buying her a colorful dress and a silk headscarf, sharing daily life, cooking together, reading.

To consider this novel, which became quite popular among Islamic youth, a criticism of Islamism from within, as many Islamic radicals did, is an oversimplification. The themes of falling in love and looking for a job can both be considered as evidence that the protagonist gives up his commitment to Islamism. But I would argue that the novel testifies to and contributes to the development from collective political Islamism toward the emergence of Muslim subjectivities. The writer, using a modern tool of self-reflexivity—the novel, a literary genre—gives voice to and subjectivizes the “Muslim.” To do this he needs to overcome the repressiveness of the collective definitions of Islamic identity. This is the site of the paradox. Political Islamism empowers Muslim actors and identity, but it hinders them in expressing themselves in their subjectivities. The novel takes a step forward in the Islamic movement’s story in that the author narrates the emerging Muslim subject, who initially owes his existence to the collective political movement but who no longer needs confrontational politics for his identity. It can be read as the “normalization” of Muslim identity. The novel tells us the story of a young Islamist transformed by the relationship of love with a member of the other sex. The revolutionary role of love in the construction of the subject is decisive. As Alain Touraine writes, “It is because self-consciousness cannot reveal the subject that the emergence of the subject within an individual is so closely bound up with relations with the other. . . . The love relationship does away with social determinisms and gives the individual a desire to be an actor, to invent a situation, rather than to conform to one. . . . It is thanks to the relationship with the other as subject that individuals cease to be functional elements of the social system and become their own creators and the producers of society.”

Hence, when our male character criticizes political Islamism and gives up anti-systemic resistance, he is not simply conforming to given values of modernity but, on the contrary, is reappropriating, blending, and composing between self and modernity.

Both as an expression of self-reflexivity and as exposure of the self in public, the genre of the novel is inseparable from the birth of the modern individual. Self-reflexivity and self-exposure in public are not a trait of societies where communitarian values of modesty prevail. Hence, Farzaneh Milani argues that the absence of autobiography as a genre in Persian (but also read Turkish) literature demonstrates the “reluctance to talk publicly and freely about the self,” a condition found not only in women, who are “privatized,” but also in men, who are expected to be “self-contained.” This autobiographical novel testifies to the newly emerging Muslim male-female subjectivities in the public sphere, which in turn constitutes a challenge to the Islamist movement. Against the totalizing ideal of Islamism, the novel carves out a space for intimacy and privacy that resists the monitoring of the personal by the public. It thus expresses the “self-limiting radicalism” of Islamism and thereby counters the totalitarian tendencies embedded in Islamist politics. The proscriptions of the Islamic public sphere are challenged from within by the intrusion of Muslim male-female intimacies. Love constitutes a resistance to the suppression of male-female subjectivities and the puritanization of the public sphere.

Nilüfer Göle is a fellow at Wissenschaftskolleg, Institute for Advanced Study, Berlin, and teaches sociology at Bogazici University. Her recent publications include The Forbidden Modern: Civilization and Veiling (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1996). Her current research concerns contemporary Islamism and the formation of elites.

44. Milani, Veils and Words, 201–202.

45. On how to read, analyze, and interpret contemporary “autobiographical voices” as ethnographical material, as constructions of self and community, as revelations of traditions, as recollections of disseminated identities and cultural criticism, see Michael M. J. Fischer, “Autobiographical Voices (1,2,3) and Mosaic Memory: Experimental Sondages in the (Post) modern World,” in Autobiography and Postmodernism, ed. Kathleen Ashley (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1994).